member or close friend to try to sort out the deceased person's affairs. The person involved in the search may need to find a birth certificate, marriage certificate, insurance policies, house deeds and so on. The first hurdle to overcome is usually passwords. Sometimes they'll look for papers that have been lost or mislaid. Sometimes they'll search for hours or days looking for something that doesn't actually exist. They'll search for answers to questions such as: Where did the deceased person store personal papers? Did he/she have a Will? Did they have life insurance? (25% never get paid out because the policy can't be found!) Did they have savings or investments? Where might they have kept a record of passwords? Where would they have kept bank account details? How many pensions do they have? What were their previous addresses? Where are the house deeds? Did they leave any final wishes, cherished possessions or funeral arrangements? Not keeping accurate records is one of the main reasons why there's a need for the Unclaimed Asset Register where there are billions of dollars, just waiting to be claimed. What began as a checklist for a partner, soon became a book, written by somebody who knows exactly what it's like to lose a close family member and be faced
